- Notes
- Linseed is reasonably well suited to organic production because it is not particularly responsive to inputs.
 - Only low levels of Nitrogen are used on conventional crops
 - Linseed is not susceptible to disease
 - Flea beetle is the only potential pest and this has not been a problem in recent years
 - Linseed is not a particularly competitive crop, so stale seedbeds are recommended.
 - Although most conventional crops are desiccated, the crop will mature naturally, although some patience is needed. Alternatively crops can be swathed. Linseed does not shed or shatter and will wait for the combine. (We have considerable experience of combining Linseed and can provide advice on the relevant combine settings and procedures.)
 - Our growers have achieved individual yields of up to 2.0 t/ha (0.8t/acre) and average yields of 1.75t/ha (0.7t/acre). However, in common with all crops, yields will vary from year to year and we would suggest budgeting on 1.25 – 1.75t/ha (0.5 – 0.7t/acre)
 - Linseed is an excellent break crop which helps to improve soil structures, with associated benefits to following crops.
